MODERN FARMING NEEDS BUSINESS MANAGEMENT

Labour and Capital Must be Fully Employed—Lowest Cost of Production and Highest Marketing Required

Farm management is the application of business principles to farming. A farm enterprise must be organized for the purpose of securing the greatest possible results. It is not enough to raise good crops of corn, wheat, or other crops. The farmer must also produce a surplus. This is accomplished only by raising conditions at the lowest cost. Every department must be well managed. Labor must be fully employed. Labor must be properly utilized, both in quantity and quality of production must be secured and the products must be sold at the highest price.

In the days of our fathers the farm was a family affair. Everything was done by the family. The few things not raised on the farm were raised in the village. The measure of his success was his ability to produce his own food and clothing rather than his ability to organize his business and sell well. Since that time, however, has been introduced in the farm and on the farm, but has become necessary for the farmer. No longer can the farmer trade his products and buy what he needs. He must now manage his farm as a business. He must not only produce his own food and clothing, but he must also produce a surplus. This is accomplished only by raising conditions at the lowest cost. Every department must be well managed. Labor must be fully employed. Labor must be properly utilized, both in quantity and quality of production must be secured and the products must be sold at the highest price.

ATTEMPT TO KILL RUSSIAN EMPEROR

tails of a plot to assassinate the Czar have been made public and show that on the eve of the Czar's visit to Odessa a well-laid plan was being executed.

The Greek man arrived at the Hotel de Londres, the principal hotel in the city. He showed a Swiss passport. All newcomers were being shadowed, so two detectives were set on watch at the room next to the stranger's. He was arrested as he left the hotel the next morning at nine o'clock, an hour before the Clair was supposed to pass the hotel. A search through his baggage did not reveal anything and the detectives were about to let him go when a waiter told them he had given a box to the hotel porter to put in the ice box.

When opened this was found to contain two loaded deadly bombs. The stranger confessed that he had intended throwing them at the Caesar, but he refused to give his name.

Throughout India

BOMBAY, July 16.—Just over nine hundred deaths so far has come to the cognizance of the authorities, were caused by wild animals and snakes in the Punjab during 1913, as compared in 1914 in 1917. Snakes accounted for all but ten of this total in 1913 and for all but eight in the preceding year. These two years are the only ones in the last eighteen years in which casualties from snake bite have been below 500. Altogether 3,080 snakes were destroyed throughout the province.

Two persons were killed by wolves in Gurgaon and one in Karnal, two by leopards in Gurgaon, two by hyenas—one in Kangra and the other in Solan—and three deaths were caused by the "gobera," or poisonous lizard (Eublepharis macularius), in Himachal Pradesh.

The number of cattle killed by wild animals was 1,502, as compared with 99 in the preceding year. Bears and cougars were chiefly responsible for the destruction. Large amounts were paid in rewards for the destruction of these animals.

The hog was killed on the roadside after it had fallen out of a rig and been stunned. It was dressed by a farmer and left hanging in a shed for two days. Hickey then disposed of it to a butcher, who in turn sold it to a farmer who couldn't get

"RUN TO EARTH"

By the Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," "Anna Floyd," etc., etc.

"You do not affect common sense," he asked, suddenly.

"No, I never take that, or invent any other liquor."

"And yet you drink severely any wine?"

"No," replied Pauline, indifferently. "I take very little wine."

"Indeed?"

She was the faintest possible smile. In Carrington's house he said this. He had watched Madame Durakoff during dinner, and he had noted an excitement in her manner, a nervous vivacity, such as are generally inspired by something stronger than water. And yet this woman had taken little else than water during the dinner. And it was to be observed that the almost idiotic gaiety which distinguished her manner this evening had been on her when she first entered the drawing-room as it was now.

It was a physiological condition, extremely interesting to Mr. Carrington. He was not slow to find a solution that was, in his opinion, sufficiently satisfactory. "That we must take care in some form or other," he said to himself.

Max Brawler did not touch the glass. He was a very short, stout, middle-aged man, and his new friends, the Carringtons, were the crowd of the hall together, but as they reached the dining-room, Mr. Carrington discovered that he had dropped a plate in the dining-room and that he had to go to the drawing-room door that had not been closed.

At the same time in the dining-room, the table was just as they had left it. Victor approached the table, took up the carafon containing water, and, looking it up to the light with one hand, he noticed that it was a small plain thing it with the other. He watched the one liquid mingling with the other until no further trace of the operation was visible; and then, when the Carringtons asked where he had found it, went smiling to the hall and joined the ladies.

CHAPTER XXX

Reginald Brevig was to complete ignorance of Victor Carrington's proceedings, when he received the letter summoning him to an interview with his friend at a stated time. Carrington's estimate of Reginald's character was quite correct. All this time his vanity had been chafing under Pauline's scorn and apparent oblivion of him.

He had received any letter from Pauline, and so he had been writing to him long, half-despairing letters, full of complaint against her, and breathing in every line that hopelessness love which the beautiful Austrian woman had so long treated of the equid and coward who haunts her but half existed even while she still clung to him.

Mr. Reginald had been in the habit of receiving these letters as coolly as if he had been but the fitting tribute of his transacted merits.

"Poor Pauline!" he murmured sometimes, as he folded the parchment paper, after running his eyes over the lines of her handwriting, and over their contents; "poor Pauline! how devotedly she loves me!"

And when a girl has not a penny she can call her own, if she was a great heiress, now, she would be more disappointed than this devoted but, and even existing circumstances it is nothing but embarrassment to her.

Fortunately, I cannot be brutal enough to tell her this plainly; and so neither go on. And I fear, in spite of all my hints, she may believe in the possibility of my ultimately making a sacrifice of my prospects for her sake.

This was how Reginald Brevig felt, while Pauline was scattering at his feet the treasures of a disinterested affection.

He had been vain and selfish from boyhood, and his vices grew stronger with increasing years. His nature was brutal, and not chaste, by the trials and disappointments of his life had fastened him.

In the hour of his poverty and degradation, he had been a triumph to him; it was Reginald Brevig, the famous man—men better than himself had loved in him.

It was a rich tribute to the great old man who had once been the title Reginald Brevig, the favorite of the fashionable drawing-rooms.

This it was that, when Pauline's letters suddenly ceased, Mr. Reginald was at once mortified and indignated. He had decided, in obeying Victor's suggestion, or rather command, by declining either victory or writing to Pauline; but he had not been prepared for a similar line of proceeding on her part, and it hurt him very much. She had ceased to write. Sir Reginald had some little surprise, and a touch of mortification on beholding the aspect of things. He had expected to find Pauline passive, unhappy, perhaps ill. He had expected to see her sitting at his request. He had expected much upon the cessation of her letters; and he had told himself that he had ceased to write because she was angry with him—with that angry which he had expected to find in her.

In his surprise, he found her brilliant, radiant, dressed to her best charms.

EXCEEDING THE SPEED LIMIT

(The Canadian Courier)

Now that the spotlight has been turned on Calgary, money and divers are the stories being told of lost opportunities and lucky holdings of oil stocks in that city.

It is a remarkable event, and yet has a plausible ring to it.

The chauffeur of a certain gentleman in Calgary had many times put the money in his pocket, and in consequence of his speedily proceeding. He had been up before the magistrate more than once, and he had been fined, and finally, he was caught exceeding the speed limit on the main street.

Make Monday Ironing Day

LET SUNLIGHT SOAP do your washing Monday morning and you can do the ironing Monday afternoon.

The rule, rule at the board has no place in the ironing way—so with the hardest part of washing cut out you'll feel like making it a day's work by doing at least like the ironing.

Follow the directions that cut your work in half and remember there is nothing in Sunlight to injure hair fabric or dainty linen. A $1.00 package keeps this statement.
